साङ्ख्य sāṅkhya, as, ā, am (fr. san-khyā), relating to number or calculation, reckoning up, calculating, enumerating, deliberating, reasoning; rational, discriminative; (as, am), m. n., N. of one of the three great divisions of Hindū philosophy, (ascribed to the sage Kapila, q. v., and so called as 'reckoning up' or 'enumerating' twenty-five Tattvas or true principles, its object being to effect the final liberation of the twenty-fifth Tattva [Purusha, the Soul] from the fetters of the phenomenal creation by conveying the correct knowledge of the twenty-four other Tattvas, and rightly discriminating the Soul from them; these twenty-four principles are divided into eight Prakṛitis or Producers and sixteen Vikāras or Productions; the eight Producers start from a Mūla-prakṛiti or original Producer [variously called Pradhāna, 'chief one;' A-vyakta, 'unevolved;' Brahman, 'supreme;' Māyā, 'power of illusion;' Bahu-dhānaka, 'much-containing'], which is emphatically the Prakṛiti, 'First-producer,' or 'Originant,' being a kind of primordial germ whence all the twenty-three remaining Tattvas are evolved: its first production is the 2nd Tattva, viz. Buddhi, Intellect [sometimes called Mahat from its being the great source of the two other internal organs or instruments, Ahaṅkāra and Manas, which are both modifications of it]; 3rd in order comes Ahaṅkāra, 'the I-making' principle or sense of individuality; 4th come the five Tan-mātras or subtile elementary particles out of which the five grosser elements are evolved; the preceding eight principles constitute the Producers, [all but the first being of course in one sense also Productions]; then follow, as proceeding from the Tan-mātras, the five Sthūla-bhūtas or grosser elements [also called Mahā-bhūta], viz. a. ākāśa, space or ether, having the Guṇa or property of sound [śabda], which is the Vishaya or object of apprehension for the corresponding Indriya or organ, the Ear; b. vāyu, air, having the Guṇa or property of tangibility or touch [sparśa], which is the Vishaya for the Skin; c. tejas or jyotis, fire or light, having the property of form or colour [rūpa], which is the Vishaya for the Eye; d. āpas, water, having the property of savour or taste [rasa], which is the Vishaya for the Tongue; e. pṛithivī or bhūmi, earth, having the property of odour or smell [gandha], which is the Vishaya for the Nose, [see guṇa]; each of these elements after the first having also the Guṇa or Guṇas of the preceding besides its own, and these Guṇas being sometimes identified with the Tan-mātras; then follow the eleven organs, produced like the Tan-mātras from the 3rd Tattva Ahaṅkāra, forming with them a class of sixteen [shoḍaśakaḥ]; these eleven organs are the five above-named Buddhīndriyāṇi or organs of sense, viz. ear, skin, eye, tongue, nose; the five Karmendriyāṇi or organs of action, viz. larynx, hand, foot, arms, and organ of generation; and an eleventh organ called Manas, commonly translated 'mind,' which stands between both sets of Indriyas as an internal organ of perception and action, or of cognition and volition, [see manas]: the twenty-fifth Tattva, Purusha or Soul, is to be wholly distinguished from the twenty-four just enumerated; it is neither a Producer nor Production; it is altogether passive, and simply a looker-on, having nothing whatever to do with the acts of creation, which it only contemplates, uniting itself with unintelligent Prakṛiti, as a lame man mounted on a blind man's shoulders, for the sake of observing and enjoying the acts of this Prakṛiti, who herself cannot see or observe anything; without that union no creation can take place any more than can the birth of a child without the union of male and female; this view of creation implies the eternal existence of innumerable separate individual souls, each soul by its junction with Prakṛiti causing the creation of its own phenomenal world, which world, however, has an existence of its own independent of all connection with the particular Purusha to which it is joined; moreover, each soul is invested in the first place with a subtile body [linga-śarīra or sūkshma-śarīra] composed of Buddhi, Ahaṅkāra, the five Tan-mātras, and the eleven organs, and afterwards with a grosser body formed of the five elements; the former accompanying the soul through all its transmigrations, while the latter perishes; this system also teaches that Prakṛiti and its products may be regarded as made up of three ingredients in a state of equipoise, viz. Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas, Goodness, Passion, and Darkness, commonly called Guṇas, but rather substances than qualities, and more correctly translated 'fetters,' because they are like a triple-stranded rope [see guṇa] which binds and confines the soul: the Sāṅkhya system agrees with the Vedānta in being synthetical, and so differing from the Analytical Nyāya; its great point of divergence from the Vedānta is in maintaining two principles which the Vedānta denies, [see vedānta]; it is said to be atheistical as ignoring all notice of a Supreme Soul, whose existence is, however, established by the Yoga branch of the Sāṅkhya proper, [see yoga]: the vague outlines of the system before its crystallization into a distinct school of dualism are propounded in the first Book of Manu: its more fully developed doctrines are contained in the Sāṅkhya-sūtras ascribed to Kapila, in the Tattva-samāsa, or Summary of Principles, ascribed to the same author, in the Sāṅkhya-kārikā [see below], and the numerous commentaries on these works, some of which are enumerated below: the Buddhist system and that of bishop Berkeley in Europe have many points of connection with the Sāṅkhya, but the modern philosophers of India pay far more attention to the Nyāya and Vedānta); a follower of the Sāṅkhya system of philosophy; a patronymic of the Vedic Ṛishi Atri; epithet of Śiva. — Sāṅkhya-kārikā, f., N. of a collection of memorial verses or stanzas by Īśvara-kṛishṇa in which a summary of the Sāṅkhya system is given. — Sāṅkhya-kārikā-bhāshya, am, n., N. of a commentary by Gauḍa-pāda on the Sāṅkhya-kārikā. — Sāṅkhya-kaumudī, f. = sāṅkhya-tattva-kaumudī; N. of another commentary by Rāma-kṛishṇa-bhaṭṭāćārya on the Sāṅkhya-kārikā. — Sāṅkhya-krama-dīpikā, f., N. of a commentary on the Tattva-samāsa. — Sāṅkhya-ćandrikā, f., N. of a commentary on the Sāṅkhya-kārikā by Nārāyaṇa-tīrtha. — Sāṅkhya-tattva-kaumudī, f., N. of a commentary on the Sāṅkhya-kārikā by Vāćaspati-miśra. — Sāṅkhya-tattva-pradīpa, as, m., N. of a brief exposition of the Sāṅkhya system by Kavi-rāja-yati. — Sāṅkhya-tattva-vilāsa, as, m., N. of a commentary by Raghunātha-tarka-vāgīśa-bhaṭṭāćārya on the Sāṅkhya-tattva-kaumudī. — Sāṅkhya-pravaćana, am, n. Brahmā (as source of the Veda); an elephant [cf. sāma-ja]. — Sāma-rathantara, am, n., N. of a Sāman, (said to have been created from Brahmā's first mouth.) — Sāma-rāja, as, m., N. of the author of the Dāma-ćarita and Dhūrta-nartaka. — Sāma-vat, ān, m., N. of a son of Sārasvata (afterwards changed into a female). — Sāma-vāda, as, m. a kind word, conciliatory speech. — Sāma-vidhāna-brāhmaṇa, am, n., N. of a Brāhmaṇa belonging to the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-vidhi, is, m. = sāma-vidhāna-brāhmaṇa. — Sāma-vipra, as, ā, am, Ved. skilled in Sāmans or hymns. — Sāma-veda, as, m., N. of one of the three principal Vedas (see veda), or of the collective body of sacred Mantras which constitute this Veda, (although the word sāman is thought to be connected with rt. śam, and soma is fr. another rt. [3. su], yet there is a clear connection between this Veda and the Soma ritual or moon-plant ceremonies; the principal part of its Mantras being specially arranged for chanting by the Udgātṛi priests at such ceremonies, [e. g. the Jyotishṭoma and its various stages of Agnishṭoma, Ukthya, &c.]; nevertheless it is really a mere reproduction of parts of the Ṛig-veda transposed and scattered about piecemeal, only 78 verses in the whole Sāma-veda being, it is said, untraceable to the present recension of the Ṛik: the Saṃhitā of the Sāma-veda consists of two parts; the first, called Ārćika [or Pūrvārćika or Chando-grantha], contains 585 verses disjoined from their proper sequence in the Ṛig-veda and arranged in 59 Daśatis or decades, which again are subdivided into Prapāṭhakas and Ardha-prapāṭhakas; the second, called Staubhika [or Uttarārćika or Uttarā-grantha], contains 1225 verses, also chiefly from the Ṛik-saṃhitā, but less disjointed than in the first part, and arranged in nine Prapāṭhakas with Ardha-prapāṭhakas, mostly, however, grouped in triplets, the first verse of which is also in the Ārćika, and thus appears twice in the Saṃhitā; this verse is called the Yoni or womb, being, as it were, a kind of parent of the two following verses, called Uttarā, which are required to adapt themselves to all the modulations and modifications observed in the intoning of this leading verse; directions for these modulations being carefully laid down in the Gānas or manuals for chanting, two of which, viz. the Veya-gāna and Āraṇya-gāna, are a directory for the Ārćika portion, and two, viz. the Ūha-gāna and Ūhya-gāna, for the Staubhika, the supposed efficacy of the hymns depending greatly on the right application of these directions for their utterance: it has been calculated that out of the aggregate of 1549 distinct verses remaining in the two divisions of the Sāma-veda Saṃhitā after subtracting the repeated verses, 190 are from the 1st Maṇḍala of the Ṛik, 9 from the 2nd, 40 from the 3rd, 23 from the 4th, 53 from the 5th, 77 from the 6th, 75 from the 7th, 355 from the 8th, 9 from the Vālakhilyas, 545 from the 9th, 95 from the 10th; there being also 12 verses from the Atharva-veda, and 4 from the Vājasaneyi-saṃhitā or white Yajur-veda; it will be observed that more verses are taken from the ninth than from any other Maṇḍala of the Ṛik, the whole of the 114 hymns of this ninth Maṇḍala being especially devoted to the praise of the Soma plant, and thence called Pāvamānyaḥ or 'purificational,' this plant being there not only personified as a deity but described as primeval, immortal, all-pervading, all-powerful, lord of gods, and indeed the Supreme Being himself; it is remarkable that although in Manu I. 23. the Sāma-veda is described as drawn forth from the sun, yet in IV. 123, 124. its sound is said to possess a kind of impurity, which, however, Kullūka explains to be merely a semblance of impurity, the reason given for this defect being that whereas the Ṛig-veda has the gods for its objects and the Yajur- has men, the Sāma- has special reference to the Pitṛis or deceased ancestors [this relationship implying, perhaps, a connection between the Soma plant and the moon, as this plant was collected by moonlight, and in the later mythology was sometimes identified with the moon, the supposed residence of the Pitṛis]; this Veda is said to possess eight Brāhmaṇas, viz. the Praudha or large Brāhmaṇa [= Pañća-viṃśa], the Shaḍviṃśa, the Sāmavidhi or Sāma-vidhāna, the Ārsheya, the Devatādhyāya, the Vaṃśa, the Saṃhitopanishad, and the Upanishad [sic], which last is probably the same as the Chāndogyopanishad of the Sāma-veda regarded as a Brāhmaṇa, see ćhandoga-brāhmaṇa, brāhmaṇa.) — Sāmaveda-ććhalā, f., N. of a short work (giving certain musical directions in the form of modulations and intonations of letters or syllables for the chanting of the Sāma-veda; the work contains seven chapters, viz. veya-ććhalā, āraṇā-ć°, ūha-ć°, ūhya-ć°, gāna-ć°, uttarotara-pada-ć°, and stobha-ć°). — Sāmaveda-saṃhitā, f. the Saṃhitā of the Sāma-veda. — Sāmavedārtha-prakāśa (°da-ar°), as, m., N. of Sāyaṇa's commentary on the Tāṇḍya-Brāhmaṇa. — Sāma-vedin, ī, m. a Brāhman who studies the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-vedīya, as, m. one having to do with the Sāma-veda, a Chandoga priest. — Sāma-śravas, ās, m., N. of a pupil of Yājñavalkya. — Sāma-śrāddha-tattva, am, n., N. of a part of the Smṛiti-tattva. — Sāma-saṃhitā, f. the collection of texts constituting the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-sankhyā, f., N. of a Pariśishṭa connected with the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-saṅgāyaka, as, m. a chanter of the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-siddhi, is, f. the art of accomplishing something in a peaceable way. — Sāma-sūtra, am, n. a Sūtra work belonging to the Sāma-veda, (ten such works are enumerated.) — Sāmāṅga (°ma-aṅ°), am, n. an Aṅga of the Sāma-veda. — Sāmodbhava (°ma-ud°), as, m. an elephant; सूत्र् sūtr (probably to be regarded as a Nom. fr. sūtra below; see sūtraya, col. 3), cl. 10. P. sūtrayati, sūtrāpayati, &c., to tie, bind, thread, string; to unbind, relax: Intens. sosūtryate.

Sūtra, am, n. (fr. rt. siv, 'to sew;' but said to be connected with rt. sūtr above), a thread, string, line, cord; fibre, wire; a collection of threads; the sacred thread or cord worn by the first three classes, (see yajñopavīta, p. 804); the string or wire of a puppet or doll; a short rule or precept, axiom, aphorism (in morals, religion, or science; iti sūtreṇa, according to such an aphorism); a short and technical sentence or metrical line used as a memorial rule to aid in the acquirement of any system (and hence generally expressed in brief and obscure and sometimes symbolical language, intelligible only to those who possess the key to its interpretation, this key being sometimes given in separate Sūtras called Paribhāshās, and the right understanding of a whole series or chain of rules depending on a knowledge of the Adhikāra or heading-rule and its influence [anuvṛitti] on those that follow; these short sentences and aphoristic rules, the use of which constitutes a most curious feature in the literary history of the Hindūs, appear to have been often mere aids to the memory of teachers—mere hints to guide lecturers in their oral explications; they were also especially useful in this way to the priests who had the management of a complicated ritual); any work or manual consisting of strings or long lines of the above aphoristic rules and sentences hanging together like threads, (though the term sūtra may possibly indicate not so much a line or series of rules as rules written on leaves which were kept together by strings; these Sūtra works form a sort of groundwork or foundation of teaching, not only in all religious ritual, but in philosophy, in grammar, and in the collateral subjects of accent, euphony, etymology, and prosody: thus in religion and ritual there are first the Śrauta-sūtras, and among them principally the Kalpa-sūtras, founded directly on Śruti, q. v., and treating especially of ritual; they form a kind of rubric or directory to Vedic ceremonial, or in other words, a complete systematized guide to the rambling discursive Brāhmaṇa as distinct from the Mantra portion of the Veda [see brāhmaṇa], giving concise rules for the performance of every kind of sacrifice; there are Sūtras of this kind by Āśvalāyana and Śāṅkhāyana for the Ṛig-veda; by Kātyāyana for the White Yajur-veda; by Āpastamba, Baudhāyana, and the Mānavas for the Black Yajur-veda; by Lāṭyāyana, Drāhyāyaṇa, Maśaka, and Gobhila for the Sāma-veda; and by Kuśika for the Atharva-veda; there are also two other kinds of Sūtras connected with ceremonial, viz. the Gṛihya-sūtras and Sāmayāćārika or Dharma-sūtras [often by the same authors, with special reference also to each separate Veda, and even placed by some, like the Kalpa, under the head of Sūtras founded on Śruti], which are really 'rules for domestic ceremonies and conventional customs,' and are sometimes called collectively Smārta-sūtras [as founded on smṛiti or 'tradition,' see smārta]; these led to the later Dharma-śāstras or 'law-books' attributed to Manu, Yājñavalkya, Parāśara, &c., the names of the authors of the Sūtras and of the law-books being often identical; in philosophy each system has its regular text-book of aphorisms written in Sūtras by its supposed founder, see vedānta-sūtra, nyāya-s°, sāṅkhya-s°, mīmāṃsā-s°, vaiśeshika-s°, yoga-s°; in Vyākaraṇa or grammar there are the celebrated Sūtras of Pāṇini in eight books, which are the groundwork of a vast grammatical literature, besides the Uṇādi-sūtras on certain affixes; in Vedic accent and phonetics there are the Prātiśākhyas [see prātiśākhya] and the Phiṭ-sūtras of Śāntanava; in etymology there are strings of Vedic words, and in prosody there are the Sūtras of Piṅgala-nāga on Chandas, including both Vedic and non-Vedic metres, and the Nidāna-sūtra on the metres of the Sāma-veda and Vedic metres generally: it should be borne in mind that the mixture of Ślokas in some of the Prātiśākhyas and in some more recent Sūtra works, though depriving them of the brevity strictly necessary to constitute Sūtras, does not prevent their being regarded as collections of aphoristic and memorial rules: with regard to grammatical Sūtras it is necessary to remember that all connecting words used as prepositions, however necessary to the sense, are omitted; thus, a word in the genitive case requires sthāne, 'instead of,' to be supplied; a word in the ablative requires param, 'after;' a word in the instrumental requires saha, 'together with;' a word in the locative, though sometimes to be translated in the ordinary way by prefixing 'in,' may often be used as a locative absolute, and pare must then be supplied, the sense being 'on such an affix or word coming after or following:' the word vā is equivalent to 'optionally' or 'alternative'); any rule, law, canon, decree (in law &c.). — Sūtra-kaṇṭha, as, m. 'having Sūtras in the throat or mouth ready to be repeated,' a Brāhman; 'having lines on the throat,' a pigeon, dove; a wagtail. — Sūtra-karman, a, n. Sūrī, f., N. of the wife of Sūrya, (see under sūra above.)

Sūrya, as, m. (perhaps originally suvar-ya, or, according to some, savar-ya, savar being for savan, cf. the etymology of sūra, col. 2; according to Vopa-deva fr. rt. sṛi), the Sun or its deity, (the name Sūrya being generally distinguished in the Veda from Savitṛi, q. v., and Āditya, q. v., as belonging to a distinct god; from some passages, however, it would appear that these names are intended to be interchangeable as representing various forms of one and the same divine personality; in the later mythology Sūrya as Savitṛi is reckoned as one of the twelve Ādityas or emblems of the Sun in the twelve months of the year; by Yāska, Nirukta VII. 5, he is regarded as one of the original Vedic triad, his place being in the sky, while that of Agni is on the earth, and that of Indra is in the atmosphere; many hymns or parts of hymns in the Ṛig-veda are in praise of Sūrya, e. g. I. 50, I. 115, IV. 13, VII. 60, X. 37, X. 170; sometimes he is called son of Dyaus, sometimes of Aditi; in one passage Ushas, the Dawn, is his wife, in another he is styled the child of the Dawns; he moves through the sky in a chariot drawn by seven ruddy horses or mares [see saptāśva, harīt, harid-aśva, śundhyu]; he is described as the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa, and sometimes of Agni; he is all-seeing, ever beholding the good and bad deeds of mortals, the preserver of all things stationary and moving; in other passages he is represented as holding a somewhat secondary position, being made to shine or have his path prepared for him by Mitra and Varuṇa, by Aryaman, by Indra, by the Dawns, and others; the long hymn, Atharva-veda XIII. 2, is entirely in his praise; there is another addressed to the Sun, called Bhānu, in Mahā-bhārata, Vana-parvan 166, &c.; and in the Yuddha-kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa [VI. 106, Bombay edit.], Rāma, when about to do battle with Rāvaṇa, is told by Agastya to repeat a hymn, called Āditya-hṛidaya, to the Sun, there called Vivasvat, and identified with Āditya, Savitṛi, Sūrya, Pūshan, and in fact with Brahmā, Vishṇu, Śiva, and all the other gods; in the later mythology the seven-horsed chariot of Sūrya is said to be driven by Aruṇa or the Dawn as its charioteer, who is represented without legs; the Sun, whether named Sūrya or Vivasvat, has several wives, see sūryā below, and cf. sa-varṇā, see also ćhāyā, sañ-jñā, aśvinī; by Sañjñā he had two children, Yama and Yamunā, q. q. v. v.; by Aśvinī, the two Aśvins; by Kuntī, before her marriage with Pāṇḍu, he had Karṇa, q. v.; and he is also supposed to be the father of Manu Vaivasvata, and to be the progenitor of one of the two great lines of Hindū kings [see sūrya-vaṃśa below]; seven Sūryas are sometimes mentioned, which are probably the seven planets, the Sun being regarded as a planet by Hindū astronomers; ninety-four synonyms of Sūrya are commonly given, and his epithets are almost innumerable; at the end of a Kalpa he is called Kāla-sūrya); a symbolical expression for the number twelve (in allusion to the sun in the twelve signs of the zodiac); the swallow-wort (either Calotropis or Asclepias Gigantea, = arka); N. of the son of Bali; of a Dānava; of an astronomer (= sūrya-dāsa); epithet of Śiva; (ā), f. the wife of Sūrya or the Sun, (also called Saṅjñā, q. v.); the daughter of Sūrya or the Sun, (see Ṛig-veda I. 116, 17; also described as daughter of Savitṛi and wife of the Aśvins, and in other places as married to Soma; in Ṛig-veda I. 119, 2. she is called Ūrjānī, and in VI. 55, 4, VI. 58, 4. the sister of Pūshan, q. v., who is described as loving her, and receiving her as a gift from the gods; according to some she represents a weak manifestation of the Sun; Sūryā Sāvitrī is regarded as the authoress of the Sūryā-sūkta, Ṛig-veda X. 85; in Naigh. I. 11. Sūryā is enumerated among the vān-nāmānī); the hymn about the marriage of Sūryā (= sūryā-sūkta, q. v.); a new bride; a drug; the colocynth or bitter gourd; [cf. Gr. ἥλιος; Lat. sol; Goth. sunna, sunno, sanil; Angl. Sax. sunna, sunne, sun.] — Sūrya-kamala, am, n. the sunflower, heliotrope. — Sūrya-kānta, as, m. 'sun-loved,' the sun-stone, sun-gem, sun-crystal (a kind of crystal cool to the touch and supposed to possess fabulous properties because like a glass lens it gave out heat when exposed to the rays of the sun; there is a fellow-stone in connection with the moon called candra-kānta, q. v.); crystal (= sphaṭika); the flowering shrub Hibiscus Phœniceus. — Sūrya-kānti, is, f. sun-light, sun-shine; a particular flower (probably the China rose); the flower of sesamum (according to some). — Sūrya-kāla, as, m. 'sun-time,' day-time, day. — Sūrya-kālānala-cakra (°la-an°), am, n. a kind of astrological diagram for indicating good and bad fortune. — Sūrya-gangā-tīrtha, am, n., N. of a Tīrtha. — Sūrya-graha, as, m. Svaraṇa, as, ā, am, Ved. illustrious, celebrated, (Sāy. = deveshu prakāśana-vat, Ṛig-veda I. 18, 1.)

Svarita, as, ā, am, sounded; sounded as a note, pitched; articulated; accented; having the mixed or circumflex accent, circumflexed; (as), m. the third or mixed tone between high and low, which is thought to correspond with the circumflex accent, (the other two tones being called Ud-ātta and Anudātta, q.q. v.v.; the Ud-ātta sound of a vowel is said to result from the employing the upper half of the organs of utterance, and the An-udātta from employing the lower half, while the Svarita represents a sustained mixed intonation neither high nor low, which is well illustrated by the expression tiryag-gamana, i. e. a horizontal or wavy movement of the hand as distinguished from a direct upward and downward motion; Pāṇini, however, applies the term an-udātta, 'non-elevated,' to the neutral accentless tone, and uses the term sannd-tara or an-udātta-tara for 'the very or proper An-udātta,' i. e. the true grave accent which precedes the Udātta; in I. 2, 31. he calls the Svarita sam-āhāra, i. e. 'a combination' of the elevated and non-elevated tones; the Svarita accent is denoted in the Ṛig-veda by a small upright stroke above the syllable, the Anudātta-tara by a horizontal mark underneath, and the Udātta is left unmarked; but the Svarita mark may denote either a dependent or an independent Svarita, i. e. one produced by an Udātta immediately preceding or a real Svarita belonging to the word itself, and commonly produced by the suppression of an Udātta syllable; again, as a word is supposed to have only one real accent, so words which have real Svaritas of their own do not have Udātta accents; they are called ādi-svarita, madhya-svarita, anta-svarita, according as they have Svaritas on the first, middle, or last syllable; it must also be borne in mind that when a dependent Svarita is immediately followed by an Udātta, the Svarita becomes a kind of Anudātta-tara, and is so marked, see tāthābhāvya; there were, doubtless, different kinds of Svarita pronunciation.) — Svarita-tva, am, n. the state of having the Svarita accent. — Svaritopadha (°ta-up°), as, ā, am, preceded by the Svarita; having the penultimate marked with the Svarita.

Svarityṛi, tā, trī, tṛi, one who sings, a singer (Ved.); one who pains or afflicts, a painer (= upatāpayitṛi, but perhaps to be connected with rt. svṛī).

XII. A SERIES OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

Designed to meet the wants of Students in English Literature: under the superintendence of the Rev. J. S. Brewer, M.A., of Queen's College, Oxford, and Professor of English Literature at King's College, London.

There are two dangers to which the student of English Literature is exposed at the outset of his task;—his reading is apt to be too narrow or too diffuse.

Out of the vast number of authors set before him in books professing to deal with this subject he knows not which to select: he thinks he must read a little of all; he soon abandons so hopeless an attempt; he ends by contenting himself with second-hand information; and professing to study English Literature, he fails to master a single English author.

On the other hand, by confining his attention to one or two writers, or to one special period of English Literature, the student narrows his view of it; he fails to grasp the subject as a whole; and in so doing misses one of the chief objects of his study.

How may these errors be avoided? How may minute reading be combined with comprehensiveness of view?

In the hope of furnishing an answer to these questions the Delegates of the Press, acting upon the advice and experience of Professor Brewer, have determined to issue a series of small volumes, which shall embrace in a convenient form and at a low price, the general extent of English Literature, as represented in its masterpieces at successive epochs. It is thought that the student, by confining himself, in the first instance, to those authors who are most worthy of his attention, will be saved from the dangers of hasty and indiscriminate reading. By adopting the course thus marked out for him he will become familiar with the productions of the greatest minds in English Literature; and should he never be able to pursue the subject beyond the limits here prescribed, he will have laid the foundation of accurate habits of thought and judgment, which cannot fail of being serviceable to him hereafter.

The authors and works selected are such as will best serve to illustrate English Literature in its historical aspect. As 'the eye of history,' without which history cannot be understood, the literature of a nation is the clearest and most intelligible record of its life. Its thoughts and its emotions, its graver and its less serious modes, its progress, or its degeneracy, are told by its best authors in their best words. This view of the subject will suggest the safest rules for the study of it.

With one exception all writers before the Reformation are excluded from the Series. However great may be the value of literature before that epoch, it is not completely national. For it had no common organ of language; it addressed itself to special classes; it dealt mainly with special subjects. Again; of writers who flourished after the Reformation, who were popular in their day, and reflected the manners and sentiments of their age, the larger part by far must be excluded from our list. Common sense tells us that if young persons, who have but a limited time at their disposal, read Marlowe or Greene, Burton, Hakewill or Du Bartas, Shakespeare, Bacon, and Milton will be comparatively neglected.

Keeping, then, to the best authors in each epoch—and here popular estimation is a safe guide—the student will find the following list of writers amply sufficient for his purpose: Chaucer, Spenser, Hooker, Shakespeare, Bacon, Milton, Dryden, Bunyan, Pope, Johnson, Burke, and Cowper. In other words, Chaucer is the exponent of the Middle Ages in England; Spenser of the Reformation and the Tudors; Hooker of the latter years of Elizabeth; Shakespeare and Bacon of the transition from Tudor to Stuart; Milton of Charles I and the Commonwealth; Dryden and Bunyan of the Restoration; Pope of Anne and the House of Hanover; Johnson, Burke, and Cowper of the reign of George III to the close of the last century.

The list could be easily enlarged; the names of Jeremy Taylor, Clarendon, Hobbes, Locke, Swift, Addison, Goldsmith, and others are omitted. But in so wide a field, the difficulty is to keep the series from becoming unwieldy, without diminishing its comprehensiveness. Hereafter, should the plan prove to be useful, some of the masterpieces of the authors just mentioned may be added to the list.

The task of selection is not yet finished. For purposes of education, it would neither be possible, nor, if possible, desirable, to place in the hands of students the whole of the works of the authors we have chosen. We must set before them only the masterpieces of Literature, and their studies must be directed, not only to the greatest minds, but to their choicest productions. These are to be read again and again, separately and in combination. Their purport, form, language, bearing on the times, must be minutely studied, till the student begins to recognise the full value of each work both in itself and in its relations to those that go before and those that follow it.

It is especially hoped that this Series may prove useful to Ladies' Schools and Middle Class Schools; in which English Literature must always be a leading subject of instruction.
